TRANSFERS DRIVE CUSTOMER ENGAGEMENT

Most of your customers already use transfers. Almost none of them shop.

Transfers reach 570 customers and keep them coming back. Stores reach 152, and only 19 ever return.

Excludes flagged and self-transfers. Store figures cover all purchases on record through April 2024.

You almost never ask twice — and when you do, minds change.

Of 194 customers ever promoted to, 168 were contacted exactly once. Nearly every “no” was simply never followed up.

Every one of the 194 customers you have ever promoted to

- 96 asked once, said no, never asked again
- 9 said no every time they were asked
- 89 said yes at least once

When you did ask again, some changed their mind

Only 7 customers have ever received both a promotion they declined and one they accepted, so treat the change-of-mind pattern as a prompt to test, not a proven effect.

RE-EXAMINE WHETHER THE "NO" IS ABOUT THE PROMOTION AT ALL — 7 OF 9 BOUGHT THE ITEM ANYWAY

The promotion isn't being refused. It's being abandoned.

9 customers declined a promotion for something they buy. 7 of them bought it anyway — at full price, a median of 14 days later.

THE JOURNEY TODAY

— every extra step is a place to lose them

They bought the product two weeks later, so they wanted it. Something between the offer and the till is where it fails.

WHAT TO TEST INSTEAD

— two steps, nothing to remember

Before redesigning anything, map the real steps. The data shows the gap exists; it cannot show where in the flow customers give up.

The five steps above are illustrative — Venmito's systems do not currently record how a promotion is redeemed, so there is no funnel to measure yet. Instrumenting that flow is the first task; the two-step version is a hypothesis to test against it. Based on 9 cases, so directional only.

WHAT ARE YOUR MARGINS?

The case against: transfer growth is new sign-ups, not deeper use.

Each customer transfers about the same amount they always did, while store spending has climbed since January.

Average transferred per active customer, per year

Monthly store revenue, most recent eight months

Transfer value is money moved between customers, not income to Venmito. Store revenue is actual commerce. Data through April 2024.
